without an en

done by reading a book or pictures, the pictures can be put anywhere in the class. The teacher can also give students a first sentence of the story to get them started. With a bit of advancement the exercise can be given to higher level students by giving them a short paragraph that could either be beginning, middle or end of the story and ask them to predict what could have happened before or after that. This exercise boosts imagination, vocabulary and language skills and enhances creativity. If carried out in a group, students learn to accept others ideas, argue, compare their prediction with those of other students; they also see that there is more than one view to something. It builds up team work, lets them carry out discussions and opens up their minds. At primary level this could be done individually however, at secondary level it should be done in groups.

Topic 10: Methods of Teaching Reading - Story without an Ending

This is an exciting way to teach students reading skills; in this activity, the teacher gives out the story to students without its ending and then asks them to complete the story themselves, this can be done in groups or pairs, then students share and accept each other's ideas. Later, students can swap their ending stories with the other groups. In the end, the teacher can give the original ending to the students, the students then compare their endings with it.

Another way is to give them an outline of the ending, or a gap filling exercise of the ending. The students may use the dictionary to fill in those gaps and they may be allowed to add to those sentences. A few words can be given instead and students can predict the ending through those clue words. The students enjoy reading the endings of other students. In doing such an exercise the students inculcate more than just one skill, sharing, accepting other peoples' opinions, lead them to work in pairs and groups and form an opinion, imagine and words building.
